I often try to do a quick google translate to try and learn how to say hello to a person in a different region of the world when I'm preparing to speak with them. But I worry sometimes that my true intention to show interest in the person, will come off as pretentious or insincere, or worse it will feel like I'm stalking them! Am I alone in my perception?

A lot of people in Utah fold their arms in a group meeting which often comes off in other group settings as a "defensive" or "unwelcoming" gesture. But in Utah it's very normal culturally for a lot of folks to fold their arms (in prayerful state) and we don't realize that it's off-putting for some other folks and they might get the wrong non-verbal queue about our interest in the discussion! haha.

This is exactly what I saw when the actors from RRR (the movie) came to the US for the awards ceremonies and were being interviewed by GMA, Entertainment Tonight, etc. They didn't take the cultural context into account, and clearly their PR person didn't prep them enough.

@Aaron, interesting - I cross my arms in my chair because it's backless and leanable for a standing desk, and therefore comfortable. But recently someone indicated to me they thought I was being defensive by doing this. Learning curve for sure to figure out a more comfortable way to sit!

12:25:41 From Masetshaba Motshekga to Everyone:
In South Africa, we have the race dynamic between a white male and a black woman. We have seen during testing where the facilitator is a white male, and user is a 65+ black woman who grew up during the Apartheid era usually comes with a communication break because of the power dynamics and historic racial dynamics between the two and the fear that comes with this for a user

Meyer's work effectively takes a white European standard and puts everything else up against it. I mean, what does it really mean to be a "low-context communicator"? Context itself is a culturally informed matter.

12:29:51 From Aaron Esau to Everyone:

Question for the QA portion. I'll see if it gets answered throughout the presentation: Short of having a lived experience in a given culture, what are some of the best ways to learn some of the lesser known of cultural norms of the regions where you are looking to conduct user experience research?

Yes of course. And also while you're making it show bits and pieces of what you've figured out to social media like LinkedIn. Incremental updates and feedback would take you there.

Faith in a higher power is a big aspect of my life. I've taken the approach of doing as much as is within my own personal power (learn how to structure my resume, best practices, etc) and then I research as many organizations as I can and apply to as many positions as I can that I feel fit my skillset and align with my goals (financial and professional). I have found in looking back that the jobs I have had, have lead me to where I am, and where I'm going. Don't stand still, and have faith! I know it sounds like a trope, but it really has helped me stay cheerful throughout the process!
